but I will tell you that the university has fallen short of its enrollment 'targets' but has saideRfalilandtMeteevicenpibusiden'stafibdasidess's affairs, the office that oversaw the section that was the section that was the section of the s difference between the two words. But as reported in an earlier article, the university was ordered to return $3 million for "failing to meet enrollment standards." It is this type of double message that has confused students during the Rees era and left many with a suspicious eyeltois and administratogetting the school's institutKim. Geron, professor of political science and a negotiator for the California Faculty Association (CFA) said that CSUEB is in a real crisis. While other state institutions are overcrowded and turning students away, CSUEB has been unable to lure students to the university because of atSideDitgcSisibe, CalState, og e, Sae image out to prospective new students has been a challenge. With seven new assistant vice presidents of Enrollment Services being assigned during the past 11 years, under the Rees administration, many within that department have been waiting for a system